1. After the outbreak of the war in the Pacific [ ] the Japanese closed the Peking Union Medical College [FUMC], which left the faculty and staff without occupation. Not long afterwards the authorities required all unemployed medical men in Peiping to register at the Medical College of Peiping University. Many of those who registered, especially faculty members of the FUMC, were offered positions of one sort or another in the Medical College of Peiping University, and usually those offered such positions found it discreet to accept. In some cases the relationship was tenuous and temporary; in others it became permanent. [ ] a large number of FUMC faculty members were connected in some way with Peiping University Medical College but many severed their connections after the Japanese surrender [ ] Peiping University was supported in part by funds from the French Boxer Indemnity and French influence was evident in it. During the period of the Japanese occupation [ ] a number of Japanese professors were employed in the University. After the Japanese surrender [ ] the Japanese professors left and there was a scramble [ ] to fill the vacant positions on the faculty. In this scramble candidates from the faculties of Peking and French-endowed Chung Fong Universities took part [ ] the results affected the tenure of some of the ex-FUMC professors.
